Holstein Cattle Show in Lake County June 19

The Lake County Holstein club held its annual meeting Friday, Feb. 19, at Grayslake. Luncheon was served at Hillside barbecue stand to 15 real enthusiastic Holstein breeders. E. M. Clark of the National Holstein-Friesian association, and Professor Rhode of the University of Illinois were present.

In order to demonstrate the excellence of the cattle, it was voted to hold a Black & White show on Saturday, June 19. These shows are unique in that the cattle are brought to a central picnic grounds in the morning "in every day clothes" and taken home that evening. They are judged and various educational demonstrations are given but the only rewards to prize winners are ribbons and honors.

Officers elected to carry on the important work for next year are Herman Dunker, president; George Latkan, vice president; C. W. Wray, secretary; Frank Wirts, treasurer; directors, N. G. Colvin, E. E. Elsbury, and Henry Wagener.

Two Species of Mountain Sheep, Investigator Says

In North America there are two species of mountain sheep, the Rocky Mountain bighorn and the Alaska white sheep, states a writer in the Washington Star. The desert bighorn is one of the subspecies of the Rocky Mountain bighorn, distinguishable by its small size and pale color. Its natural habitat includes the arid mountainous regions of the southwestern states and parts of Mexico.

Desert vegetation eaten by these bighorns includes cactuses and other thorny plants. The tender leaves of the spiny, pollelike ocotillo cactus are a favorite food. In times of food shortage old rams often butt their way through the thorny armament of barrel cactus to eat the juicy pulp inside the plant.

In winter the hairy coat of these animals is dark brown, sometimes so dark that a band of sheep at a distance appears as a dark spot moving across the light background of the desert sands. During spring and summer, however, their coats become faded and turn into a dull yellow. Many of the old rams have fine horns — long, cherished trophy of hunters — which are larger in proportion to the weight of their bodies than the horns of larger species. Predatory animals that attack mountain sheep usually make a hasty retreat after one or two well directed butts.

Size of Noah's Ark May Have Totaled 450 Feet

The dimensions of Noah's Ark as given in Genesis were 300 cubits in length, 30 cubits in breadth, 30 cubits in height. The length of the cubit is variously estimated at 18 inches, so that the Ark must have been about 450 feet long, 75 feet broad and 45 feet high, observes a writer in the Detroit News. The tonnage of a merchant vessel for purposes of registration is the entire internal cubic capacity in "one of 100 cubic feet each, ascertained in a manner prescribed by law. According to this method of calculating tonnage the gross tonnage of the Ark must have been a little over 15,000 tons. Scribner's "A Dictionary of the Bible," edited by Dr. James Hastings, says of its capacity: "It has been calculated that it would contain a space of 3,600,000 cubic feet and that after nine-tenths had been set aside for storage of food, there would be over 50 cubic feet each allowed for 7,000 pairs of animals. Such calculations, though in earlier times treated with all seriousness, now receive little consideration. The measurements given in the biblical text are not sufficiently detailed, nor is the description of the whole construction sufficiently explicit, to form the basis of such conclusions."

Chief Town of Dalmatia

Split, the center of the Yugoslav Riviera, is the chief town of Dalmatia. In the Third century Emperor Diocletian repaired to the site — then the little village of Aspalatum — to "plant cabbages"; but instead he built for himself an immense palace. The palace, occupying some ten acres, stands, forming a town in itself with several hundred families. In the Seventh century the emperor's mausoleum became a Dom, or cathedral, and his Temple of Jupiter is a baptistry. No building in the world, perhaps, boasts as great a mixture of architectural styles as this cathedral. There are examples of the antique, the Roman, the early Istalie, the early Gothic, the Renaissance and other arts, all accumulated as the building underwent changes and repairs in the course of sixteen centuries.

Regattas on Canals

Holland's island-fringed coast, rivers and canals provide daily regattas. Many a quaint village of this country is practically inaccessible except by water, and all agree that the most entrancing way to enter towns is by canal.

Lammergeyer is Feared by Children of Europe

Mothers of Southern Europe often subdue their children with a threat of winged terror from the sky, writes W. H. Shippen, Jr., in the Washington Star.

The lammergeyer is supposed to swoop down upon runaway toddlers, bearing them off to devour them on some lofty mountain pinnacle.

Scientists, however, say the lammergeyer, or bearded vulture, that turtles and marrow bones far better than he does bad boys and girls. He swings aloft with the turtle or bone and smashes his food upon by dropping it on rocks far below.

The lammergeyer's ten-foot wing spread enables him to fly away with large pigs or young calves. He has become rare in his native mountains of Southern Europe and is found mostly in North Africa or Southern Asia.

The lammergeyer rears its young on the highest, most inaccessible ledges. It lays two eggs in a huge nest rudely constructed of sticks. He is one of Europe's biggest birds of prey. The solid tuft of hair, or "beard," under his chin is more pronounced than in related species.

The lammergeyer feeds upon meat, like the eagles.

Mound Desert

Mount Desert, the "largest rock-built island on the Atlantic coast," has a huge, romantic history. The island was discovered by Samuel de Champlain in 1604, when Sieur de Monts was commissioned by Henry IV to establish the French dominion in America. It became the site of the first French missionary colony in America. Later, the island was given as a royal relief by Louis XIV to the Sieur de Mothe Cadillac, founder of Detroit and governor of Louisiana.

Music of the Greeks

Music was considered by the Greeks as an important adjunct of their culture. It also served as a luxurious pastime of the nobility. The instruments of the Greeks were the lyra, kithara, phormina, magadis and trigonon, all stringed instruments and much alike. Of the wind instruments, the lute assumed a position of importance, while scenes from the year 366 B. C. state that Timaea and Krates were the victors upon the trumpet at the Olympic games.
