Lady Blanche Farm

the spring and summer that his white star was to prove only a will-o'-the-wisp, to be taken from him after all?
"Yes, sweetheart, beautiful," he answered. "But I want you to know a story that was in one of those books you burned, just the same, if you don't already. I ought to have spoken of it to you before."
"As quietly as he could, he told her first of his reading of the legend and then of his talk with Mary about it afterwards.
"I can't pretend to explain it. But it seems to me the first Blanche didn't want to hurt any person, especially—that it isn't a curse in that sense—but to teach her descendants, if she could, what a terrible thing it is to be selfish. Most of all, the selfishness that calls itself love. Occasionally mothers feel that kind of love for their sons, or children for their parents, or husbands for their wives."
"You mean that is the kind that Colonel Moses felt for the countess," said Blanche slowly, "and— and it's been so, straight through the family. That's the way mother cared for Paul. That's the way—that's the way I cared for you—once. But oh, I don't say more."
"That isn't the way I've cared for you," said Philip. "I'm not very strong, and I'm not very good. I don't think that for a minute. But I do love you with all my heart and soul. That—that makes more difference than anything else, I believe. That curse is never going beyond this generation, and you must tell me tonight, that you're glad—I ought to have gone to war when I first knew it was the right thing for me to do. We can't help that now. But you've got to say
