Hundreds of MEN are helping wash these clothes...

IN THE OLD DAYS women washed alone. Every week they spent arduous hours bent over a washboard, scrubbing dirt loose from grimy clothes . . . twisting out rinse water with arms that ached.

But modern wash-days are different. Home laundries are now equipped with electric washing machines that hum as they work. A switch is snapped—and clothes are quickly swished clean in hot sudsy water that hands hardly have to touch. Another switch starts a motor-driven wringer to turning. Washing isn't a day-long ordeal any more. It's easy to have everything out blowing on the line in two short hours.

"Behind the scenes" of this modern home laundry is an interesting picture. Actually, hundreds of men are helping with the washing. A complicated system of service is operating. Conveyors are feeding tons of crushed coal into boilers. Powerful turbines are roaring. Miles of copper wire, deep underground and high overhead, are alive with electricity. Turn a switch any time, day or night, and this electricity goes instantly to work for you.

In the average home in northern Illinois it costs just a fraction over a cent to run a washing machine for an hour. And electricity speeds through other once-tedious chores just as economically—sweeps carpets for less than a penny an hour—irons clothes for less than a nickel an hour. It toasts bread, bakes waffles, heats chilly corners, brings bright cheerful light to every room for a trifling sum.

In spite of the great variety of uses to which it is put in every home, the cost of this electric service is only a small portion of your family budget. Have you ever tried to figure where else you can get more comfort and convenience?
