Bandfoot, Largest Rat

The bandfoot rat, a native of India and Ceylon, is the largest of known species of rat. Its body, black above and gray beneath, is frequently more than a foot in length and its tail, which is very thick at the base, is equally long. It feeds on grain and roots and is very destructive to gardens and poultry, burrowing under walls to reach what it wants. On the other hand its flesh is a favorite article of food with the natives. It resembles that of young pork.

Corn Crib in Mexico

Corn cribs in the neighborhood of Oaxaca and Morelos, Mexico, must be of the feminine gender because they wear ruffled grass petticoats. Once common enough, this type of granary is a comparatively rare sight in the hot country. The peon farmer has taken a tip from his enlightened brethren in Iowa and Nebraska, where the ultra-scientific corn crib is built on stilts covered with up-side-down tin cans to keep out rodents. In fact, only one consideration keeps the less practical but more beautiful type of crib from being entirely superseded. In southern Mexico, corn is plentiful but tin cans are scarce as water is a hot running hot water.—Detroit News
