pretended to cough respectfully.
"My mistake."
"I don't like."
"I know. I know."
Doris glared at him. "You know what?"
"What you don't like."
"That's that. Then."
"My attitude."
"I wasn't going to say that at all. I was going to say that I don't like to go down to dinner with a man who has not all over his nose."
"You win. It's agreed, then, that we're not going to give each other away."
"Not tonight anyway."
They went down into the dining room. Mr. and Mrs. Du Val were full of a secret elation that showed in the burning of Oscar's dark eyes, and in the curve of Mrs. Du Val's happy lips.
"Ah now, this is something," said Oscar Du Val with satisfaction. He slipped behind Doris' chair with an air of rivalry. Rocky held out his mother's chair gallantly.
"The women seated themselves.
"Such soup," sighed Rocky. "I haven't tasted anything as good as this for years."
"You haven't been home for years," said Oscar Du Val. "You've got to be married if you will be different. Ah, yes, Doris will see that he comes home regularly, as a good boy and a true one."
Rocky changed the subject. "How's the Memorial coming on, Dad?"
"The Memorial? The talk like that, my boy. What do you care about the Memorial? You talk silly. To-night we want to hear where you and Doris plan to live. I do not approve of New York. It is too noisy. The dirt is bad for the children. I am right, am I not, Adeore?"
His wife was looking at him reproachfully. It was evident that she considered Oscar was being far from delicate in alluding to the unborn children. Doris was so much the child she had never seen mentioned the child to her mother-in-law.
"Oh, yes, you are always right," said Mrs. Du Val discreetly. She caught Doris' embarrassed eye, and laughed slightly. "You should not live in New York."
"No, no," said Rocky loudly. "Don't want to live in New York." His raised voice gave such an odd effect that both his parents stared at him in astonishment. His face was red with the effort he was making to keep up his end of the conversation. "In fact, we've just wanted to live in Larchmont, haven't we, Doris?"
"Larchmont?" echoed Doris in astonishment.
"We saw such a dear little house on the edge of the Sound. There were some great woods round the place. I should think the salt water would ruin them," said Oscar sarcastically.

Oscar made an impulsive judgment. Doris was so much the child she had never seen mentioned the child to her mother-in-law.
