CHAPTER IV.

Toulon, on the Mediterranean, was at this time the great military depot of France. Its inhabitants numbered about twenty-five thousand; and more than fifty frigates and ships of the line rode at anchor in its harbor, while within its spacious magazines was collected an immense quantity of military and naval stores.

Scarcely a day passed during the fall and early winter of 1793 that did not bring to the city families and individuals from all parts of France, seeking protection from the Revolutionists' curricula—outrages which the Committee were utterly unable to control, or to which they were indifferent.

At Toulon, the friends of the old monarchy argued among themselves that the violence with which their head had been filled was too terrible to be longer endured; and they began to discuss the idea of surrendering the city, its magazines, and its ships, to the combined English and Spanish fleets lying outside its harbor, and thus help to bring about a return of law and reason to France.

Among those in Toulon who heard of the proposed surrender was Margot, who, with Jean and Pierre, safe under the humble roof of their new home, had for these many months enjoyed a security she had never before known. In a measure her own mind was removed from the dread of Elise, as she found reliance and peace in the kindly guidance of Pere Huot, to whom the boys went for instruction, his abode being some distance from Margot's small house, which was in a retired part of the city, near the suburbs.

A surrender suggested to her the possibility of bringing scenes of bloodshed and violence; and the very name of "English" was to her—as to most of her compatriots—the synonym of what was utterly detestable.

Her fears were not without cause. The surrender was accomplished, and the English ships sailed triumphantly into port, landing five thousand of their own troops and eight thousand Spaniards.

This proceeding was regarded with the greatest alarm and indignation by the Revolutionists, who, considering the surrender an act of treachery, resolved to retake Toulon, and drive the allies from the soil. Three thousand men were marched upon Toulon; and a siege was begun which for three months made but little apparent progress.

At the various eating and drinking places frequented by them. One of these was called "Le Chien Jaune," a two-story house situated down near one of the quays. Lights were blinking brightly from its small windows, and inside several stores were burning, where Thiel, the landlord, and his one assistant, were preparing supper for several civilians and soldiers who sat about, talking and drinking, at the various small tables.

Sitting near the fire, two soldiers and a citizen, together with Jean and Pierre, were listening to a man in their midst, who, from his talk and appearance, seemed to have been an extensive traveler. This was Laro, an inhabitant of Le Chien Jaune, who, on shore from the "Aigle," a rakish-looking brigantine, of which he was owner and captain.

Jean listened with an attention which, for some reason, appeared to amuse Laro, who now and then, with a quizzical smile, lighting his black eyes, glanced askance at the boy's enraptured face.

Laro's story had been listened to by others as eagerly as possible, he seemed occasionally reminded Thiel to hurry their supper.

The next minute a soldierly-looking man came in, the entrance of a pretty officer showing as he unclipped and threw off the heavy cloak that had enveloped him. After demanding supper as speedily as possible, he seated himself some distance away from the group at the fire.

But Pierre had been starting open-mouthed at the man, and now the sound of his voice caused Jean to start, and turn his head quickly in the direction of the shadowy corner where the soldier sat, near the suburbs.

"Grelot!" he breathed. "What is that, my cocksparrow?" Toulon harbors many a stranger tongue, but be sure, but I speak only my own."

so dark," replied Jean, grasping the soldier's hand. "And you?" "Much better for the few suppers I have been eating," said Grelot, a note of laughter in his voice.

Pierre now fell behind, and the three stepped more briskly. "What have you to tell me?" inquired Jean, after they had gone a few paces, and Grelot remained silent.

"Did your lieutenant send you—was he wishing to know of me?" asked Jean eagerly. But there was no answer.

"Well, yes, and no," replied Grelot, speaking slowly, as if considering his words, and adding, as he looked down into the boy's upturned face, which even the dim light of the stars showed to be filled with keen disappointment, "Surely you have every reason to know his face for you; and he is one who never forgets. But his days are now filled with that which leaves little time for him to think of anything but this siege. He can't contain the city, with the Revolutionary forces."

"He without, and you within, fighting against him?" burst from Jean's lips, as he drew himself away from Grelot.

"Sh!" whispered the soldier. "These streets may seem deserted; but 'tis as well not to speak loud, for every wind may carry the word to where the wrong ears may hear them."

"Jean laughed softly, and came closer to Grelot.

"Ah—I see how it is." "Be all the more careful, then, my young master," warned the soldier. "There was silence for a time, while the three walked slowly along until they reached a street where the houses were far apart, and the last one of all, from whose windows came a faint gleam of light, Jean pointed out to Grelot as his present abode.

"And so that is where you are living," said the soldier, as they stood looking toward it. "I tell you, lad, that had I the chance to possess so quiet a home, I should stop within it, and not be wasting into such shambling of carnage and blood as is the city now. Take my advice, and keep away from Le Chien Jaune. I can now come to your house; and you will be the best place for me to see you. But, if you are to undertake the mission of which you speak, the less you see of that accursed Laro, the better will it be."

"Laro is my friend," declared Jean, his quick temper rising like a flash of fire. "He is my friend, and even you must name him in such fashion to me."

"So?" said Grelot calmly, taking his hand from the boy's arm. "Then I doubt if you are to be trusted, and regret telling you as much as I have. Laro is not to be trusted. He is almost old enough to be your father; and, his suspicious once aroused, he has sufficient craftiness to surprise your secret, and use it for our harm."

Jean was silent, and Grelot went on in a milder tone. "Now tell me, were you in my place would you not think twice before risking secrets with such a kuper—one who cares so much for Laro as to have temper with an older friend, who, knowing the man's reputation, warns you against him?"

"I am not angry, Grelot," declared Jean, "and regret that I was so. Forgive me."

"All right—all right, mon ami," was Grelot's hearty reply. Then, again lowering his voice, he asked in a half quizzical tone, "And do you wish to see our little colonel?"

THREAT TO DROWN STOPS FIGHT.

Young Wife Rushes for River When Husband Battles With Man. William Beckman and Daniel Kim, both of West Alton, met at the depot in Alton to take a train for St. Louis, when they resumed an old quarrel and soon were the center of a ring of interested spectators, consisting principally of West Alton people, who were so eager to see which of the man would whip that most of them missed their train home. When Kim Beckman, who is a bride only a few weeks, saw her husband in the center of the human ring she screamed for some one to stop the fight, but no one interfered. Mrs. Beckman tried to separate the fighters herself, but failing to do so she ran screaming toward the Missouri river. The fight ended and Beckman ran in the river back to save his wife from her apparent intention of self-destruction. The wife was persuaded not to drown herself, and Beckman and Kim agreed, it was said to fight the battle to a finish at some other time.

Small Boy Notifies Him When Marriage Licenses Are Issued. "I can't land them; come after them yourself," was the message received by Justice Beach when he was trying a case in East St. Louis. Going direct to the marriage license office, the justice was accosted by a small boy who keeps him posted about persons receiving marriage licenses. A couple who gave the names of W. P. Evans, aged 24, and Miss Anna Simpson, aged 23, both of East St. Louis, were pointed out in a group of men, some of them rival justices who wanted the usual fee for performing the ceremony. Justice Beach told the couple that they might as well come along with him, as they would never be able to pass that "bunch," pointing to the increasing crowd. They consented, and with one on each arm, the justice triumphantly led them to his office, where the ceremony was performed.

Though put up in coarser form than Theodor's Black Draught, removed for the cure of the digestion troubles of persons, it has the same quality of invigorating digestion, stirring up the torpid liver and breaking the constipated bowels. All stock and poultry. It is carefully prepared and its action is so beneficial that stock grow and thrive with an occasional dose in their food. It cures hot cholera and makes hogs grow fat. It cures chicken cholera and round makes hens lay. It cures constipation, distemper and colic in horses, murrain in cattle, and makes a draught animal do more work for the feed consumed. It gives animals and fowls of all kinds new life. Every farmer and raiser should certainly give it a trial.

It costs 25c a can and saves ten times its price in profit.

PITTSBURGH, KAN., March 25, 1904. I have been using your Black Draught Black and Poultry Medicine on my stock for some time. I have used all kinds of stock food and I have found that yours is the best for my purpose. J. S. HANCOCK.

A Grim Tragedy is daily enacted, in thousands of homes, as Death claims, in each one, another victim of Consumption or Pneumonia. But, when Coughs or Colds are properly treated, the tragedy is averted. F. G. Huntley, of Oakland, Ind., writes: "My wife had the consumption, and three doctors gave her up. Finally she took Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, Coughs and Colds, which cured her, and today she is well and strong." It kills the germs of all diseases. One dose relieves. Guaranteed at 50c and $1.00 by Geo. C. Roberts & Co. druggists. Trial bottle free.
