CHAPTER XV.

Lang Rescues a "Hunted Man."
The emigrants crossed the borders late the "Convict Country" early in the morning. At about noon they came upon what at first sight looked like an old time palliaded farm house and barn, surrounded by a high fence of logs driven into the ground. The house was farmed of logs, two stories high, and sitted with shutters of unhewn oas, which could be drawn over the windows when necessary. The, whole building was protected from view by a magnificent growth of large trees and an artificial curtain of vines growing on frames which trained them to run from limb to limb of the trees.

This last remark of Golden touched Johnson in a tender spot.

"If you come back this way soon I will pull up stakes with you and we will make the trip together."

"All right, old man, we understand one another then."

The schooners being ready, the words was now given to move on. Two women were exchanged here, two knowing ones for two who were quite ignorant.

Making an Audience Laugh.

I am glad there is no recipe for maling an audience laugh. We should thank heaven that it is so. There are thank never thank the second on the unsuspecting public if some one were able to tell 'how in a few comprehensible lines. Either one is born with the power to make others laugh or hg is not; there is no learning how unless you have toe gift. Some one has said that to make andiences really laugh you must feel the laugh yourself—must be moved the laugh yourself—must be moved to the laugh yourself—must be moved by the humor. It is cauself, the same place every right for six months and see just how much you are moved by the humor. It is causer, far easier, to be moved by a pathetic situation each night than it is to feel like laughing. An American sudience naturally likes the American type of humoring the laugh your situation or thought. But—and here is the secret—before you speak them you must really understand them and know what line of thought causes them to be spokes. If you can do this you can communicate their humor—David Warfield is Success Magazine.
