CHAPTER XXIII.

Schiller Makes a Proposition to Lang.

"B are you voto," said Schiller, rishing to feet, and by a gestime, with his hank commanding stience, "citizens of Paradise, allow me to say a word. I have allowed Golden to say his say; now I want mine. Golden has accused me of crimes I am not guilty of. Louis Lang is a convict; I sentenced him to death, not through spite but because he struck me—me, the king: It is a fit and the only purishment for that crime. I did not detain his wife in my palace, though it is true that she was found at my home. She came to my palace and asked the whereabouts of her father and I told her he was safe. Because she did not see her father, she said, I will not believe it! She doubted my word, and said, I will remain here until you bride my father to me!" It was not my place to argue with her; ordered my guard to remove her.

"Every word that he has uttered is a lie!"

"Every word that he has uttered is a lie!"

Last night, after working hard in the mines all day, he cane home, expecting to find his loring wife waiting for him. Was she there? No! Tracting her to the very palace of the kind. Lang dared to lell the tyrant to his face that he was detaining her against her will. Whalen, whose body you see lying in the dust before you, has paid the penalty of less than this with his life. Convict or no convict, I was about to explain to Lang the was detained to lay his hands upon my wife. (Applause). "I maintain that when a man enters this place and takes the oath of allegiance to our law, that he has rights that we are bound to respect. Because we have found it necessary to be here is no sign that we are beasts—human brutes! (Applause). The contract of the macr. T can take care of myself if only you give me a fair chance. I do not however, want to see injustice done to anyone. R is time to quit this revenge business and grant Lang and Huntington the freedom of our-city. I think the people good enough to rule, and Rogers and I, as the majority of the Council of Three, think these people punished enough. What do the people think!"

"Life to Lang!" was the cry.
"Make Golden king!" was another shout. And the turmoil was deatening.

"Make Golden king!" was another shout. And the turmoil was deafening.

"We accept your pardon of Lang," sald Golden, but I do not wish to be king. Neither Rogers nor I hold any gruden against Schiller—all we want is to see justice done! Curb his majesty all title; make his office one of mayor; see if he is not worthy of trust, and make a man of him. If that don't work then make Rogers his continued to the same of the same terial with which the miners could how up the miners in making their escape.

Dr. Humtington, when he was made aware that his letter had been sent to his wife, was at case, commanded to the wife, was at case, commanded to the wife, was at case, commanded to his wife, was at case, commanded to his wife, was at case, commanded the gained the respect of the citizens by his kindness and care in sickness and, was looked upon as a valuable acquisition to the city. Dr. Humtington had great hopes of ultimately being made free, of being allowed to return to his wife. Somehow or other Pearl's welfare did not seem to trouble him much. "A friend of mine lost his wife two years ago. Last week he heard of a beautiful medium in the Square De L'Opera, and attended a couple of her seances. I saw him yesterday. He had already become an enthusiastic spirityalist.

"Why, it is ridiculous," said it.
"Ridiculous! Indeed, no. he returned. My friend, do you know that at each seance the spirit of my dear dead wife returned and kissed me?"
"Nonsense." I exclaimed. 'Nonsense. Do you mean to tell me that your dead wife honored those miserable seances enough to come and kiss you in her own person."
"Well, not exactly in her own person." he replied. 'Her spirit took possession of the medium's person and kissed and embraced me through her.'"—Chicago Chronicle.

Life Line is Parted.

The line frayed on the side of the ship, and after eight persons had made the trip to shore the strands parted. Throughout the hours that had intervened since the vessel struck and the life saver had been dragged aboard the little band had waited bravely, and there was no suggestion of a panie when the line parted. Fortunately the sceldent occurred when the buoy was on its return to the vessel.
