HIS ANNUAL SPRING FEVER.

Himself.

[Copyright. 1807, by Homer Byragus.]

Mr. Rowser had been very quiet for five days. He had made no experiments and no purchases. He hadn't threatened the cat or pursued any umbrella menders. He hadn't threatened the cat or pursued any umbrella menders. He hadn't tirted any gas saving patents or meddled with the water pipes. Mrs. Bowner, had waterbed him closely and been a good deal worried. That heywas lying low to break out in some new spot she madly realized, and it trobbed her to grate what new idea he would degree what new idea he would degree without an outbreak, the cook clime to her and whispered:

"Ma'em, I'm a girl that is near-sighted."

There Was No Explosion.

There Was No Explosion.

There was no explosion, although a climax came to Mr. Bowrser's strange conduct. On the fifth morning at the breakfast table he quietly observed:

"Mrs. Bowser, I am going out into the country today and may not be home at the neural hom."

"Mrs. Bowser, I am going to hunt rabbits?"

Tam not going to hunt rabbits?

"I am not going to hunt rabbits?"

Tam not going to hunt rabbits?

"I am not going to hunt rabbits?"

"I am not going to hunt rabbits?

He sunpped his answer in such a way as to forded her from pursuing the sudject further, and, though she wondered a great deal, she had no more to say. When he was ready to leave, he said he would telephone her if anything happened to detain him overnight and went away with a cloud of mydery clinging around him like an around the control of the was hardly out of sight the control of the was hardly out of sight the control of the was hardly out of sight the control of the was hardly out of sight when the cook came upstains to whisper:

Liked Looks of Farm.
"I am no chicken buyer," was the reply in tart tones. "I rather liked the looks of your farm and so turned in.
Perhaps it's for sale?"

The farmer and his sons took a good long look at the man before them, and then the farmer replied:
"Yes, I might sell if I was offered my price. Won't you sit down on the price. Wou't you sit down on the begol?

Mr. Howser had never set out to buy a farm before, but a sort of natural natural tool bins that there were certain questions he ought to ask. He therefore said down and lisheded a citar and assumed a knowing air and questions are supported by the submarine soil of this farm; I see that the surface is a many loans."

"Of course."
"Of course,"
"It's blue clay, the best subsoil in the world."
"What's your principal hay crop-ciover or Holstein?"
"You must mean timothy?"
"You must mean timothy?"
"You must be a course."
"And how many hundred randels of wheat to the arre?" continued Mr.
Bower as he seewled at the grinning sons.

"How many hundreds? Lord, man, but you can't mean hundreds! Land that will grow thirty bushels of wheat to the acre is worth walking fifty miles to see. My land grows about twenty, and it's called mighty good hand."
"Well, about corn?" was asked as
