

Molty's Story.

The two rode steadily, following the trail left by Hamila and Hughes earlier in the morning. As there had been no wind, and the cold had crust we had been no wind, and the cold had crust we had been no wind, and the cold had crust we ponies were easily followed. As two youngs were easily followed. As two youngs were castly followed. As two youngs were the ridge, the folian pony hard could be distinguished, assidiently close by the tings the Indian castlously kept back out of sight in the breaks of the ridge, although his the breaks of the ridge, although his ley, discovered no sign of pursuit. Tired as Dupont's horse undeutstelly was, he might not yet have attained the Indian senampnent, which, is truth, might be much further away than Hughes had supposed. The fact that no spring of temperature was the supposed of the fact that no spring of the way that the supposed of the fact that no spring of the supposed of the conseniment. Indeed it was quite perceived for a considerable distance. Possibly, however, the bluffs were higher and more abrupt, further up stream, affording better chances of concesiment. Indeed it was quite the concesiment. Indeed it was quite the most shall had the were the most shall had the way the two the concesiment. Indeed it was quite their white camp, irrespective of any possible fear of stack. Reasonably east from a winter campaign, the strootless of the past summer would naturally dead to make them unusually cautions and watchrid.
