HER LACK OF SYSTEM

By FRANK WINGET.

"Where's the ice pick?" inquired the ordinary man, coming up stairs from the basement and hunting languidly in the tool drawer.

"Isn't it in the drawer?" His wife came across the room to help him hunt. "Not there? Isn't that strange? I was sure it was there."

"Strange!" The ordinary man's tone was scornful. "Strange!" He shut the drawer with a bang. "If I've bought one ice pick, I've bought fifty! If I want to have a thing in this house where I can find it when I want it, I've got to keep it chained in my pocket with my keys! I never heard of another house like this!"

He put his hands into his pockets and strode up and down the kitchen as he talked. "Here's the ice melting and nothing to chip it with—and hotter than fury! I suppose you never dreamed that we'd need food drives this weather. An ordinary woman would have seen to it that that ice pick was somewhere where it would be handy! But your mind is wandering off somewhere."

"It's the same way with every tormented thing around this ranch!" stormed the ordinary man. "Last winter could I ever find the hatchet when I wanted it? No! Hatchet after hatchet I brought home, and yet as soon as I needed one there was not one to be found! You let the children play with them or sell them for brooms, I suppose! But as far as putting them away in any regular place and remembering the spot over night—why, I'd drop dead if you ever suggested such a marvel!"

"Could I find the garden rake this spring? No! I had to go down and buy out the hardware store after I'd laid in a whole new outfit last summer."

"Why?" interrupted his wife. "you know yourself that you lent your garden outfit to Mr. Daniels and he carried them away when he moved and—"

"Yes, and you expected me to come from the office and hang around when Daniels moved, to see that he didn't carry off my property! Hang it! Why don't you watch out for a few things! Why can't you keep your eyes open!

You seem to think I am solely responsible for things about this place! I don't know who is responsible if it isn't you! You ought to see the place father had at home. There was the tool shed and it—"

"Yes, a big tool shed—and who took care of it? I heard your father say that he passed all his leisure time in that shed. And your mother said she never had a day of repairs—your father was so good about remembering everything. He kept all her knives sharpened and—"

"I suppose you think I ought to hang around home sharpening knives, when I can get a man for half a dollar to sharpen all we ever owned! It shows how much you think of my business ability. You can't appreciate my work."

"I never said I didn't appreciate anything. But you said your father—"

"Now, we'll leave my father quite out of the discussion," exclaimed the ordinary man, finally. "His nothing to do with the ice pick being gone. Here it is Sunday and no ice pick! I tell you it's the same with the hammer—and with the screw driver that I got last Christmas. I've never seen them—"

"Oh!" exclaimed his wife. "Don't you remember that you fixed up a bench in the attic with your new tools Christmas week and I'll bet your things are up there!"

"Jinny! That's what I did! He took the stairs two at a time. 'Yap, here they all are! Lucky I had the good sense to put them away or they'd be all lost by this time. Shows what a good housekeeper you are not to know they're here!'—Chicago Daily News.

Forewarned is Forearmed.

"I'm not in business for my health."

"Neither am I."

"Good! Now that I know you'll skin me if you get a chance and you know I'll skin you if I get a chance, let's get down to business."

Just the Opening for Them.

"Are you for or against the efficiency experts?"

"For 'em strong. I notice the gas company is going to hire a whole lot of 'em to go around each month and read the gas meters."
