HONOR AFTER 40 YEARS

A belated honor came to one of agricultural's greatest benefactors a few days ago, when Prof. Stephen M. Babcock of the University of Wisconsin was given a gold medal and $5,000 in cash in recognition of a service performed 40 years ago. He is now 87 years old.

It was in 1890 that Prof. Babcock perfected a method of determining the exact percentage of butterfat in milk. The process consists simply in adding a proper quantity of sulfuric acid to the milk to coagulate the butterfat. The acid, however, requires that for a short time, when the butterfat will rise to the top and the amount can be read off by means of scale marks on the bottom necks.

Instead of patenting his process, Prof. Babcock gave it to the world, and it has been in use ever since. Watered milk has no chance of getting by when this test is applied. As Governor of Wisconsin once said, "Prof. Babcock made dairymen honest—that's the best kind of honesty."

The prize mentioned was given by Senator Cooper of Kansas for "the most distinguished service to American agriculture." Perhaps the most remarkable thing about the award was how little it was bestowed, not only because the importance of Prof. Babcock's discovery, but also because of his generosity in freely giving it to the public, instead of taking the rich money awards which a patent would have assured him.

IMPORTANCE OF INDUSTRY
RECOGNIZED

That one of the most prosperous and populous states recognizes the advantage of encouraging industrial development and employment is shown by the book which has just been issued by the Illinois Chamber of Commerce. The introduction to the book says: "The permanent and increased prosperity of Illinois depends upon the presence of extensive and diversified industries."

Then follows accurate and authentic information on the resources, advantages and opportunities offered in Illinois for present and future development of industries and business.

This book furnishes an object lesson to many states which, instead of attempting to encourage industrial development, invest in the public welfare and are content to pass industry and discourage the man who is trying to build up payrolls and create wealth.

When as great a state as Illinois exports half its earnings in the form of raw material, it is time that smaller communities recognize the importance of industry as the basis of prosperity if they wish to hold their own in the march of commercial progress.

SMALL TOWN BIG STORE

Another instance of a big store is a small town. According to attention, that of May & Company in Elgin. More than 1,000,000 people, but having a trading radius of 30 miles, according to Editor Khalif of the Elgin Review.

The store is 30 years old, the day store is 43, and during all these years the store has never failed to have an advertisement in every issue of the newspaper. In that time a record has been kept which shows that 90 percent of the trade is conducted within a radius of 30 miles, according to the editor, who adds, "by the way, is an exceptional weekly newspaper."

Elgin, then, is a combination hard to beat—a high-class newspaper and an enterprising store that never lets the public forget its sales message, whether times are good, bad or indifferent. And such a combination will win almost anywhere, as it has in Elgin, where people within a radius of 30 miles make up their trading center in a town of 3,000.

WEYLER, THE BUTCHER
General Valeriano Weyler of Spain, who died a few days ago at the age of 92, was the last of the officers of high rank who sought to suppress the final revolution of Cubans against Spanish rule. To his just policy was largely due the popular indignation which finally led the United States to espouse the cause of the Cuban rebels in 1898 and win their freedom.

Weyler was sent to Cuba in 1896, shortly after which he adopted the "no quarter" system whereby Cuban women were herded in concentration camps where thousands suffered and died. He was generally known through Cuba and the United States as "Weyler, the Butcher," and as such he is remembered in the western hemisphere.

He was recalled to Cuba in 1897, but the settlement against Spanish because of his harsh treatment of the people at the battle of Minae Havana in Minae harbor or the night of February 15, 1898, and made war inevitable. Soon Cuba was freed from Spanish rule forever.

Weyler was a Spanish captain-general of Madrid and held numerous important military commands. About four years ago he was court-martialed on a charge of plotting to overthrow the government, but was acquitted, and had since lived quietly in retirement.

ONE EYE ON THE JOB

That a wage-earner, whether a laborer or industrial executive, should seek through any legitimate means to better his condition is entirely commendable. But too many seek for such commendable in distant fields, when the real opportunity lies in the present job.

Every employer has to deal with the fellow who no sooner gets located in a position than begins to look for something better elsewhere. He has one eye on his present job and the other on a new one.

No intelligent employer wants to lose a man who shows efficiency in his work and loyalty to his employer. The rewards of such efficiency and loyalty will generally be on the part of the employer.

But when an employer knows that an employee is continually looking for another position, it is taken as evidence that only half-hearted service is being rendered, and the employer begins to look for someone to take his place. The fellow who keeps both eyes on his job usually profits most in the long run.

HERO IN A HOLE

There were depths as well as heights of the heights. Bill Strout, a Colorado oil driller, is one of them.

When a big bit was lost in the hole of an oil well being drilled near Branson, and after efforts had been made in vain to retrieve it, the driller had to go down to the bottom of the hole, 12 feet in diameter, to get the bit.

At first the officials of the company refused to permit him to take the risk, but finally agreed. Bill went down the 24-inch hole in a soft rope sling. The hole was caving badly and there was soft mud at the bottom, under which the bit was buried. After working for 90 minutes, he had to go down several times to put his head under the wavy mud, he succeeded in getting two half-bolts with a log chain around the refractory.

He signalled to come up and the bit shortly was drawn out without further trouble.

This was the first time, so far as known, that a man has ever gone to such a depth in an oil well in that region, where even at shallower depths gas ordinarily would be intolerable.

In taking such a risk of being buried alive by the mud and rock of a caving well, Strout added his name to the long list of oil-drillers who perished their lives as a part of the day's work.

There, then, is a combination hard to beat—a high-class newspaper and an enterprising store that never lets the public forget its sales message, whether times are good, bad or indifferent. And such a combination will win almost anywhere, as it has in Elgin, where people within a radius of 30 miles make up their trading center in a town of 3,000.
