(The Doctor of Towns)

ABOUT TWO YOUNG LADIES

Two young ladies are walking down the street in opposite directions. One has on all blue, the other cotton; but otherwise they are dressed alike.

A young man comes up of a sudden, a moment's time a fainter comes, out onto the street from several hours work in a basement. At the same time two men come into the street from the side pass each other, directly in front of the one with the all blue going north, the other with cotton goes south.

At which way does the young man look? He came out of the barber shop, and which way does he look? Answer to both questions south.

And if either or both of these young ladies look upon which one of the young men will the other casual observation? The one handsome, with suit and dust, or the one who has had himself shaved and shined, shampooed and otherwise "prettified"? The answer you know.

There are many more people going to see the doctor. A lady had come from the doctor's office, upon which one of the young men will the other casual observation? The one handsome, with suit and dust, or the one who has had himself shaved and shined, shampooed and otherwise "prettified"? The answer you know.

A happy, well dressed, "finished" town, a community run down at the heels, in spots, at all over? Will they look "north" or "south" or "east" or "west"? The answer you know.

There is no argument against quality of merchandise, so there is no alternative but to make it and you to really enjoy it.

The only difference between Cinderella of the ash-tray and Cinderella of the glass-slipper was the difference in appearance and you know which.

too weak to defend her or because she would not accept a defense that had been blind to her need, but now that he knew, her control was over. Her decision became the plaintive cry of a woman left alone in the wilderness.

He was brought from this by the swift flight of the car as it whirled half around and came grinding to a stop beside the curb. It was impossible to distinguish anything but lights and a moving mass beyond the blurred windows, but he heard the reproachful voice of his driver calling to him:

"You see that, sir? A bad accident. It's a sight for a dave to be out in. They've got the street roped off. I'll have to go around the block, sir."

Brian's hand moved to the door handle before his mind registered his intention. His instincts were all awake, carrying him upon a fierce tide. He sprang out of the car, telling the man to wait.

The street was a jumble of broken things. A line of enshrouded, shivering in the rain but kept warm by their electric, pressed against one another, forcing their way, inch by inch, upon the forbidden ground. Police in gleaming leather coats ordered them back, threatening with clubs what words failed to effect. The front of an automobile, ludicrously elevated, was the pivot of this street war and Brian, pushing his way through the line, saw a grotesque wreck of machinery that seemed to be sitting the town at last after thousands of weary days.

He did not know why he was there, except that his body, no longer subservient by mind, brought him, without volition, into a poor tragic comedy of the dread night.

"People had been killed. Robes and blankets, brought from somewhere, covered the still things with a spurious decency. Ambulances were coming; their distant clamor, dulled by the heaviness of the air, beat upon the shrieking silence."

A poor creature, once a woman, crouched at Brian's elbow: "Three of 'em dead—three! Something ought to be done about it. Three of 'em—just like that!" She snatched her fingers.

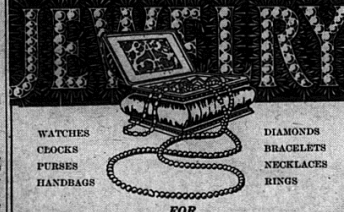

He saw that there were three women beneath a blanket of the ground. Their feet, in high-heeled slippers, protruded from the shallow covering; the edges of their dresses showed and their thin stockings, drawn over slender, terrible limbs.

The black bulk of the patrol wagon told about them. And then he saw, close to his feet, a larger mound, that must have been a man, slithered a voice: "Shoveled him right, too, but let her be for it slain as himself."

A instant advanced upon them.
