All Talk Not in Powder; Other Minerals Are Used

Talc is a mineral which finds many uses on account of its extreme softness and unctuousness. It is so soft that it is readily scratched by the finger nail and feels as slippery as if it had been greased.

Its familiar use as talcum-talc powder depends on these properties as well as the absence of grit and the fact that it does not cake or become plastic when wet.

Talcum powder is the pure mineral ground to powder and perfumed. Sometimes a little boric acid is added as a mild disinfectant. Other somewhat harder and less unctuous minerals such as sericite and apatite are sometimes substituted for the talc, and chemical products are sometimes substituted for special purposes. In colonial times our grandmothers used fuller's earth as baby powder.

Talcum powders account for but a small part of the talc used, according to Field Museum News, an organ of the Field Museum of Natural History, Chicago. For every pound of talc ground for talcum powder forty pounds are used in other ways.
