The Man From Yonder

circle of freight Dawn McLaughlin seemed to struggle close to Able Armitage, face pallid even under the ruddy glow of flames. Her eyes followed just one figure; that of Ben Elliott. Commanding, resourceful, a human dynamo, he was. Shortly after midnight the supply team drove up from camp, the cook drew back blankets which had covered its burden, commenced putting generous pieces of steaming steak between slices of bread and the cook poured coffee from huge pots for the men who swarmed around the sleigh.

Back to the decks in the woods went the locomotive; down it came again, bearing more logs. These were left to a pile which rose almost to the track level. When it was three feet higher nearly half the snow bearing was finished.

Workers staggered through the snow bearing a steel rail. It went into place; fish plates clattered; wrenches set nuts and spikes put the rail secure on ties.

So when the locomotive, leaking steam from its old joints, lumbered down with its next burden, the track was set out on this length of new track and began the task of filling in the far side of the ravine, leaving a shulterway through which the waters of the stream gurgled and surged.

Blackmore joined Able and Dawn on the bank where the freight struck topaz lights from the snow. The old justice turned an inquiring gaze on him and the boy shrugged. "Two o'clock," he muttered. "He's got less than six hours left to turn the trick."

"It doesn't seem humanly possible," Able said slowly.

"I'm beginning to think," Blackmore replied, "that the man isn't human. This thing would've stopped most men I know without a try. But not Elliott?"

Daybreak found them throwing the last load of logs into place and the pallid light of the early day revealed Elliott's face, drawn and gaunt and colorless; his eyes burned brightly, strangely dark.

"The only chance is that the locomotive be late," Blackmore moaned to Able.

Six o'clock, and broad axes shaped the logs on which the ties would rest, and up from the siding came a team at a trot, and behind it another. These were men from "Stump who had been at the work going on. They left their sleighs and looked at the emergency trevise and then stared at one another and shook their heads in amazement. Things like that just didn't happen, they seemed to be thinking.

Then came a battered cutter, with old Tim Jeffers driving alone, to see what way to be seen. "I heard the shots in town last night," he told Able. "Come morning I drove this way."

The old justice nodded grimly. "You guessed, then."

"Tim split angrily. "The lad was getting too close to his mark to suit some folks, it seems."

Seven o'clock, and men staggered up the embankment bearing a rail five minutes later it rang and sawed as the spike went home, and another, the last, was brought up.

The gap was bridged, the last spikes were going in; the particular job was done, but traction screwed up and up, as a tiddie string it tightened. . . .

"It was seven-thirty, and far as a locomotive screamed.

"The local!" Blackmore gasped. "She's at Dixon. . . . In a half hour, now. It's the boy's luck!"

A half hour! A half hour in which to move six standard cars laden with a heavy scale of saw logs over that grade! Two trips. Ben Elliott had estimated it would take. Two trips for the leading locomotive to dig them the three miles to the siding and put it away back and trundle the other three over the hill and down the slope. It was a half mile from the river to summit with a better than four per cent grade. A good locomotive of even small tonnage might take them over at once; but not the old rain that stood sending its plume of smoke into the morning air up the track yonder. And if those logs were not put down for the train even now screaming its way toward the siding, Ben Elliott was beaten.

He straightened, flinging away his saw, saw the last nut tightened on the final fish plate and then, holding up both hands, face fixed toward the locomotive with its staccato of cars waiting around the bend and up the hill to the north, he began to run.

Holding them there? When the trevise was ready? Men wondered why, audibly, excitedly, stirred from their weariness by this strange move. Instead of high-balling them on, Elliott was holding them back.

Hatje Asks That Water Department Audit Be Finished

Trustees Pass Motion; Ask Majority for Status of Legal Cases

The village attorney, David H. Maloney, has been instructed by the board of trustees to present the following items of information:

A list of all cases and matters in which he represents the village.

The present status of each case.

The amount of time spent by the village attorney on each case.

The above information was presented in a matter before the board. Earl Hatje and passed unanimously by the board. Mr. Hatje also made two other important motions which were carried by the board. One was that the village board reverse its recently adopted policy of refusing to pay the occupational sales tax on materials which were used in the village.

Mr. Hatje pointed out that the policy was unfair to dealers who could not afford to shoulder the burden of a 2 per cent tax which was originally intended to be passed on to the consumer.

The other motion was that the village treasurer be authorized to continue his audit of the financial relationship between the village general fund and the water account. Mr. Hatje wants to determine if the large consumers are charged enough to pay for the water they use.

Last summer the village board instructed the treasurer to prepare an audit of the water account so that it could be determined if the village was overcharging on quantity water production. Heavy consumers of water questioned the accuracy of the treasurer's report. A preliminary audit indicated that the cost of production was higher than the rate paid on large quantity consumption.

A second audit was started by the treasurer working in conjunction with a committee from Jew Tea Co., headed by Allen C. Hunt, assistant treasurer of the company.

The audit was never completed. In that connection Mr. Hatje wrote the following letter to Mr. Hunt as of February 11:

"Dear Mr. Hunt: Recently the village board accepted your offer to cooperate with the village treasurer in our effort to ascertain the true cost of water to village water users.

"Will you please advise if you desire to continue in this audit if you are of the opinion that the report of the village treasurer may be accepted as being a correct statement of the facts in the matter?"

Local Boy Scouts Exhibit in Three Business Windows

Barrington's three boy scout troops have arranged special exhibits in the show windows of three firms in the business section of the village. The exhibits are in conjunction with the local troops' observance of the twenty-fifth anniversary week of the founding of the Boy Scouts of America.

The exhibits represent the activities of the scouts and demonstrate many of their achievements. The results of their efforts are brought out in several handsome wood carvings.

The various troops have exhibits in the following places of business: Troop 10, (Cavaliers) Jewlery store; Troop 21, S. L. Oshy and Sons clothing store; Troop 19, A. H. Saxe Hardware store.
