Four-Eyed Fish Inhabits Rivers of South America

Ereight is fishes generally to excellent, as anglers well know, and it involves many interesting peculiarities. The oddest one, perhaps, belongs to the four-eyed fish, a big minnow—the biggest, in fact, of the minnow family and occasionally reaching the size of a moderate brook trout—which inhabits the rivers of eastern South and Central America. It is a surface-swimmer like its cousin, the gambusia, the favorite "tropical" in aquaria; and seems to be quite as comfortable out of water as within it. Thus it spends much of its daily life in the air, scrambling over soft mud banks or on mudflats where it finds certain insects, various small crustaceans, and bits of carrion to its taste. Whether this habit brought about the double vision the fish possesses; or whether, having such an advantage of this opportunity, are questions for theorists. It feeds over. At any rate, says a writer in the Montreal Herald, this singular fish is structure, making the rather large and protruding eyes doubly useful, enables this fish to swim with its face just out of water, one-half of the eye watching whatever may interest it above the surface while the other half gives it notice of an enemy beneath the surface.

Flower Capital of World

Orbit, northwest of Brussels, claims to be the flower capital of the world. Its suburbs have miles of hot-houses—the world's first one was built there about 300 years ago—and in them orchids, begonias, lilies and carnations are grown for the whole continent.

Buddhist Numerology

The sacred books of Buddhism abound in numerical imagination. In them is pictured Buddha seated on a throne adorned by 100,000 pearls and surrounded by minor gods forming an assembly of 500,000,000 persons.

Used Man-Traps

Man-traps, resembling large rat-traps, with steel jaws armed with teeth that sank into a victim's leg, were at one time used extensively on thousands of farms and estates in England to catch poachers and trespassers. But so many innocent persons were caught and badly hurt in them that they were made illegal in 1827—Collier's Weekly.

Origin of "Chalice"

"Chalice" from the Latin "calix" refers to a cup or bowl, especially the cup used in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. This term, originally signifying a common drinking vessel, now usually is applied to a communion cup. From wood or other cheap material in early times, chalices came to be made of glass, agate, silver and gold, with engraving, enamel and different kinds of costly decoration. Some of them have great historic interest and value, and are preserved in church treasuries and museums of Europe. It generally is held that a chalice must have a stem or foot which supports the bowl. This is intended to secure the hold of the person who hands it to the communicant. It has cover which may be the paten or dish for the consecrated bread.

Apostle of Greenland

Hans Egede (1686-1763), a Norwegian Lutheran missionary, was known as the apostle of Greenland. He went to Greenland in 1721 and, with the support of the Danish government, founded a mission at Godthaab, devoting himself to Christianizing the Eskimos until ill health forced his resignation. His son, Paul, also a missionary, translated the New Testament for the use of Eskimos.

If we do say so... there isn't another foundation like an Artist Model

We're proud of it, of course, and you'll know the reason for our enthusiasm when you see the DIFFERENCE in this foundation. It combines the fitting advantages of the ONE giraffe which does most for your hips and diaphragm, with the ONE brassiere which does most for your bust... all in an amazingly sleek ONE-PIECE garment. The secret? Four tiny invisible tabs and buttons which attach the giraffe to the brassiere... and which, happily allow for a quick change in brassieres.
