Culture of Orchid Long, Tedious Gardening Task

The culture of orchid tubers place one step at a time and with only one step a year, says the Milwaukee Journal. The milne seeds are placed in tubes with agar-agar, a Japanese seaweed, and are sealed. A year later the sprouted seeds are picked out with tweezers and placed in a jar. . . . Another year and the tiny separate plants are isolated in separate jars in which are mingled soil, charcoal, pieces of broken pot and osmunds, a fern which comes from the Indian marshes.

During this slow growth the orchid plants must be protected from cold draughts at all costs. They cannot tolerate the temperature of 60, which is suited to blooming orchids at night but must be furnished a home where the air is like a perpetual wash day with the boiler going at full blast. The orchid demands not so much heat but plenty of humidity.

When a child does come to flower the grower need have no further worry. Provided he treats it right, he can be certain that it will go on producing the exact order of flowers of its primary bloom to the end of its life. It runs true to type.

In the florist's shop the orchid is a "prestige item." It must be carried in order to continue the trade that the shop is "fussy" and that it serves a luxury loving patronage. It is said that it costs some 80 cents to produce a single orchid blossom.

committee which has a great deal of work to its credit.
