"The Reason"

BY ELEANOR SMITH
I had occasion, one morning, to make a brief call at a friend's home. She met me at the door, holding in her arms her little four-year-old daughter who was sobbing in an exhausted manner.

"Why, Anne, what's wrong?" I asked in concern.

"Oh, the same old thing," she answered. "Jean has one of her queer spells. She came running in from the garden where she'd been playing with her brother and his friend, and just screamed and cried, and I can't do anything with her."

"Have you ever seen the doctor about her?" I asked.

"Yes, and he said there was nothing wrong—said she was temperamental," Anne answered.

"Well, I dislike to contradict a doctor, but he doesn't know Jean as well as I do," I retorted. "Jean's not temperamental!"

"Well, I've about given up," Anne confessed to me after Jean had been put to rest in a darkened room for a little while. "Of course, it would never do to let Jean know that, but —" She shrugged her shoulders expressively.

I must confess I was puzzled too. Why should Jean, who was naturally of a sunny, sweet-tempered disposition, have such "quarrel" so often when she played with the boys? It was three days later that I found the answer.

I was at Anne's again. There was thunder in the air, and I was talking to Anne when the first crash came. Jean, who had been playing quietly on the floor with her doll, screamed and ran to her threw a woman overboard when we're pirates."

I could not reprove him for he played in all good faith, never dreaming that the games that were meant and dinned to him were terrifying to little four-year-old Jean. So here was the explanation of Jean's "quarrel spells." Poor Jean!

I spoke to Anne afterwards, though rather fearful of offending her. But I need not have worried; she was very grateful. Later she explained the matter carefully to Harold, and Jean no longer plays the part of the "scalded lobster." A little careful forethought in providing appropriate occupations and amusement is helping her to forget her unhappy experiences and to develop confidence.
