Reviewing The Children By LYDIA LION ROBERTS A mether may sometime do more toward helping her children's development in a quiet hour by herself than in many hours of talking to them. In order to help a child to build his character into something fine and enduring, much of an adult's time and patience is required, as well as the histelliguant concentration of the child himself. To attain and keep a complete, well-rounded personality it is necessary to secure proper growth, and if one is benefited at the cost will be less satisfying. The child must grow physically, mentally and spiritually in order to become a vital, capable and serene human being, able not only to adapt himself to the various requirements of the world, but of yet from the contacts.
